

The Battenkill 1,539 square feet

The Battenkill, in the Vermont valley of the same name, is where Charles Orvis discovered a keenness for building fly rods and created a 149-year tradition. Today, the trout are still streambred and famously difficult to catch.

THE BATTENKILL

MAIN LEVEL FLOOR PLAN

UPPER LEVEL FLOOR PLAN

The Battenkill's design is remarkably simple, bringing together a small living room/kitchen space, bunk room, and upstairs master bedroom – all in one classic rectangular cabin plan. An efficient kitchen and four-top dining area makes the Battenkill similar to a traditional honeymoon cabin, albeit with a spare bedroom. The Battenkill's gathering areas are intentionally modest in size, lending themselves to intimate family gatherings and encouraging exploration of the outdoors, where the plan provides spacious porches. The Sportsman's Room, in its own space apart from the living areas, acts like a porch-type area itself.
